Dear Recruiting Officers,

I am aiming for the Technical Product Manager role.

For the past 3 years, I've been working in the tech industry with global teams remotely and async. I trained as a backend developer for a season: the team taught me Agile practices, working as an independent and autonomous nucleus producing meaningful outcomes periodically. As a technical writer, I worked closely with the talent and marketing teams: interviewing regularly with developers as subject matter experts, I valued their knowledge and the relationships they opened up to me, so this triggered me to aim and foster further these kinds of conversations.

Later, I worked as a Project Manager close to the Development and QA teams: an interesting, challenging, and satisfactory role, since the team builds and sees hand-offs to the end-users thru quick iterations. I have grown from technical positions to more hands-on roles, with ever more contact with several stakeholders, such as CEOs, users, and clients; aiming to deliver solid and timely results, focusing on teamwork, and making the best use of time.

I believe that my background as a sociologist gives me an awareness of all sides' needs, and fits me well for interviews, research, and testing; I also enjoy prototyping, wireframing, and attending to User Experience [UX], all of which I hope help to deliver great products, and enjoyment with final results for all parties.

Thank you for taking the time to consider my credentials.
Sincerely yours,

Benjamin Juarez
